

Psychology and Personality: The Main Theories

✓ Exclusively available on IvyPanda

Personality involves individuals' characteristic ways of thinking, feeling, and acting. There exist theories that inform learners of their understanding of personality. They include straight theories that examine individuals' behavior patterns, and social cognitive theories focus on people's traits, thinking, and social context. Humanistic theories center on individuals' inner abilities to grow and achieve self-fulfillment. Lastly, psychodynamic theories focus on human functioning based on the interaction of internal drives and forces within people, mostly on the unconscious mind and in the existing structures of one's personality.

These theories emerged from Sigmund Freud's psychoanalysis theory of personality-related treatment techniques. Through his discovery of the unconscious, Sigmund Freud came up with speculations surrounding the cause of the psychological disorder. These speculations failed, and he later turned to the free association. He claimed that this aspect gave individuals in therapy the freedom to examine their thoughts without intervention from a therapist (Myers & DeWall, 2020). Freud proposed that the consciousness is divided into three elements known as the id, ego, and superego and that the relations and conflicts among these components created personality. He proposed that personality development occurs during the five stages of psychosexual, oral, anal, phallic, latency, and genital.

Freud believed that people defended themselves from anxiety through the ego that shields themselves using defense mechanism strategies that lower and redirect anxiety through altering reality. He proposed seven mechanisms that protected the ego from conflicts created by the id and superego. Freud's theory was widely accepted and rejected by many people. For example, the theory of the unconscious was widely accepted and is currently utilized in several models of human behavior and different professions. Neo-Freudians rejected his claims that sex and aggression were consuming motivations. Psychodynamic theorists and therapists in the contemporary world reject Freud's emphasis on sexual motivation. As per the modern research findings, most of one's mental state is unconscious and that childhood occurrences impact an adult's personality and attachments patterns. For personality assessment,

A Closer Examination of Applicant Faking Behavior Richard L. Griffith, Mitchell H. Peterson, 2006-05-01 The faking of personality tests in a selection context has been perceived as somewhat of a nuisance variable and largely ignored or glossed over by the academic literature Instead of examining the phenomenon many researchers have ignored its existence or trivialized the impact of faking on personality measurement The present volume is a much needed timely corrective to this attitude In a wide range of chapters representing different philosophical and empirical approaches the assembled authors demonstrate the courage to tackle this important and difficult topic head on as it deserves to be The writers of these chapters identify two critical concerns with faking First if people fake their responses to personality tests the resulting scores and the inferences drawn from them might become invalid For example people who fake their responses by describing themselves as diligent and prompt might earn better conscientiousness scores and therefore be hired for jobs requiring this trait that in fact they might not perform satisfactorily Second the dishonesty of the faker might itself be a problem separate from its effect on a particular score Someone who lies on a pre employment test might also lie about the hours he or she works or how much cash is in the till at the end of the shift Worse these two problems might exacerbate each other a dishonest applicant might get higher scores on the traits the employer desires through his or her lying whereas the compulsively honest applicant might get low scores as an ironic penalty for being honest Outcomes like these harm employers and applicants alike The more one delves into the complexities of faking as the authors of the chapters in this volume do so thoroughly and so well the more one will recognize that this seemingly specialized topic ties directly to more general issues in psychology One of these is test validity The bottom line question about any test score faked or not is whether it will predict the behaviors and outcomes that it is designed to predict As Johnson and Hogan point out in their chapter the behavior of someone faking a test is a subset of the behavior of the person in his or her entire life and the critical research question concerns the degree to which and manner in which behavior in one domain generalizes to behavior in other domains This observation illuminates the fact that the topic of faking is also a key part of understanding the relationship between personality and behavior The central goal of theoretical psychology is to understand why people do the things they do The central goal of applied psychology is to predict what someone will do in the future Both of these goals come together in the study of applicant faking      Papers and Proceedings American Sociological Society.
