The Last Stroke Lawrence L. Lynch, 2015-10-31 It was a May morning in Glenville Pretty picturesque Glenville low lying by the lake shore with the waters of the lake surging to meet it or coyly receding from it on the one side and the green clad hills rising gradually and gently on the other ending in a belt of trees at the very horizon's edge There is little movement in the quiet streets of the town at half past eight o'clock in the morning save for the youngsters who walking running leaping sauntering or waiting idly one for another are or should be on their way to the school house which stands upon the very southernmost outskirts of the town and a little way up the hilly slope at a reasonably safe remove from the willow fringed lake shore The Glenville school house was one of the earliest public buildings erected in the village and it had been located in what was confidently expected to be the centre of the place But the new and late coming impetus which had changed the hamlet of half a hundred dwellings to one of twenty times that number and made of it a quiet and not too fashionable little summer resort had carried the business of the place northward and its residences still farther north thus leaving this seat of learning aloof from and quite above the newer town in isolated and lofty dignity surrounded by trees in the outskirts in fact of a second belt of wood which girdled the lake shore even as the further and loftier fringe of timber outlined the hilltops at the edge of the eastern horizon and far away
