rooms were shut up Its owner who died rather more than a year before the date of our story preferred a town residence and rarely inhabited the hall Extravagant and fond of play he had cut down the fine timber that ornamented his park to pay his debts Death however put an end to his career before he had quite run through his fortune He left behind him a wife and an infant son the latter being heir to the property As there would be a long minority the estates by prudent management might be completely retrieved On the demise of her husband the widow quitted her town house and took up her abode with her child at the old hall With a greatly reduced establishment she lived in perfect seclusion As she was young very beautiful and much admired people wondered that she could thus tear herself from the world But her resolution remained unchanged Her affections seemed centred in her infant son She had few visitors declined all invitations and rarely strayed beyond the limits of the park She had got it into her head that her child would be taken from her and would not therefore let him out of her sight The infant was as carefully watched as if he had been heir to a dukedom and at night for fear of a surprise the drawbridge was always raised In the event of the young heir dying under age the estates passed to the brother of her late husband and of him she entertained dark suspicions that did not seem altogether unwarranted Having offered this brief explanation we shall return to the mysterious pair whom we left making their way to the hall As their design was to enter the house secretly they did not go near the drawbridge being provided with other means of crossing the moat One of them carried a coracle a light boat formed of a wicker framework covered with leather Though they had now reached the margin of the moat which was fringed with reeds and bulrushes they did not put their plan into immediate execution but marched on in silence till a light was observed glimmering from one of the windows A taper had been thus placed to guide them proving that they had a confederate in the house On perceiving this light which streamed from the partly opened casement on the dusky water beneath it the foremost of the twain immediately halted He was a tall man wrapped in a long black cloak with a broad leaved hat pulled over his brows and was well armed As soon as the coracle was launched he stepped into it and was followed by his attendant who pushed the frail bark noiselessly across the moat On reaching the opposite side the chief personage sprang ashore leaving his follower in the boat and made his way to a postern which he found open as he expected Before entering the house he put on a mask The postern communicated with a back staircase up which the midnight visitor quickly mounted making as little noise as possible
