Other epidemiological studies have provided evidence that the genetic susceptibility to tuberculosis is determined by the presence of a specific gene on the major histocompatibility complex (MHC) on chromosome 6. This gene encodes a protein that is involved in the presentation of antigens to T cells. The MHC is a highly polymorphic region of the genome, and the specific alleles of the MHC genes are thought to determine the susceptibility to tuberculosis. The MHC is also involved in the regulation of the immune response, and the specific alleles of the MHC genes are thought to determine the response to different antigens. The MHC is also involved in the regulation of the immune response, and the specific alleles of the MHC genes are thought to determine the response to different antigens.
