Instead of this, it is advised that you use 'For all entries...' the statement, it will fulfil your requirement.

What is the difference between a singleton and a static class ABAP?

A singleton is a design pattern where the class is required to create objects. The class ensures that only one object exists for every internal session which is available to consumers. Therefore, when you create a singleton class it does not allow you to create multiple instances of the class, instead, a single instance will be created which behaves as a global access point to reference that class throughout the lifetime of the application component.

A class which only contains static components and no instance components is known as a static class. The user can directly access the components using the "=">" operator. A global static class is loaded once with its class pool into the current internal session. Like every ABAP program, it cannot be clearly deleted from the session. In subclasses, the static methods (declared using CLASS-METHODS) of a class cannot be redefined.
