

TACKLING TEXTS

Whether you are a writer of screen dramas or a student who has to write literature essays, your task is the same: the adaptation of a novel into another form – an English Literature essay or a film script. You both face the same daunting task.

The student has to condense all the events, themes, and ideas of a long text into enough manageable knowledge to be used in an examination answer. Similarly, the writer of a screenplay has to condense the entire text into a faithful representation of no more than a few hours in length so that viewers who have read the original text recognise a version of it. Where do we start?

There are five key aspects of a novel that both the student and the screenwriter need to tackle in order to:

- a) analyse and understand the book
- b) create a new representation of it in the form of an examination essay or a screen drama

These are:

PLOT: not just the story but the order of events in the text

SETTING: the place where most of the events in the novel occur and the representation of a society

CHARACTERS: the people who interact in the text and whose behaviour we watch and learn from as readers and viewers

VALUES: the issues raised by the text

STYLE OR METHOD: how the novel is written

It is when a reader looks closely at each of these five aspects of a novel that they begin to read it as a construction - not just a story.

By tackling the text of Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice in this way, we will soon be able to appreciate how the screen version has been constructed.

Firstly, the screenwriter has to approach the film producer with a story - can the story of a novel be recreated within a manageable time span. A long novel cannot be slavishly copied page by page - the story has to re-examine in terms of:

PLOT: how the text is organised
