Primary Source Analysis Paper

Choose a document from the Baker anthology (The Old Regime and the French Revolution). Alternatively, you may find a document elsewhere. After reading it carefully write an analysis of 1500 to 2000 words by answering the following questions. Be sure to answer all the questions and in the order in which they are listed.

Who was the author? Do not restrict yourself to providing the author's name. Try to derive something about the author's biography, particularly the author's social class, profession, and (if applicable) political status. Make use of Baker's headnotes. Also, in some cases the document itself will provide information about the author. Do not use outside sources for this question.

Who was the intended audience? Was the document intended for a general audience, for specialists in a particular field, for "posterity"? (Keep in mind the possibility of multiple audiences.) Does the document consist of material that was not originally meant to be published (e.g. private correspondence)? As with the first question, the headnote might be helpful. Also, the document itself may give some indication of its intended audience.

What is the story or argument that the document is relating? You should answer this question in some depth. This is your opportunity to present the substance of the document to your reader. Though you don't have to give all the details in the document, be generous with your description. Also, if the document is making an argument, explain how the author goes about persuading the reader. What evidence does the author use? What kind of reasoning does the author use? Do appeals to emotion figure into the argument?

What is the purpose of the document? Why did the author write it? Was he or she trying to persuade, entertain, inform, commemorate, honor, warn, or instruct? (This is not an exhaustive list of the possible goals, and it is possible that the author had more than one goal.)

What assumptions are made in the document? This question involves reading between the lines. Assumptions are rarely stated because they are so widely shared and because they are considered "natural" by the people who have them. For example, I do not have to say, "Read a document and answer questions about it because this will contribute to your education, and education is valuable," since we all agree that education is valuable. When reading your document try to find assumptions about what was considered valuable, moral, praiseworthy, fair, natural, etc.

What does the document tell me about the society that produced it? This question is related to the previous one in that assumptions reveal knowledge about a society, but there is more to a society than its assumptions. When answering this question discuss such things as social conflict, economic conditions, political contests, prevalent ideas and emotions (e.g. fear, anger, optimism), the state of scientific knowledge, or some other feature of the society that produced the document. Be careful not to assume the author's point of view. For example, if the author argued that French society was in decline, do not write that "the document tells me that French society was in decline."
