

The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie

INTRODUCTION

BRIEF BIOGRAPHY OF MURIEL SPARK

Born in Edinburgh to a Jewish father and Presbyterian mother, Muriel Spark (then Muriel Camberg) was herself raised as a Presbyterian. From 1922 to 1925, she attended the James Gillespie's School for Girls—a model for the Marjorie Blaine School featured in The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie—going on from there to teach English and then to work as a secretary in a department store. In 1927, Muriel married Sidney Oswald Spark and moved with him to Southern Rhodesia (present-day Zimbabwe), but soon discovered that Sidney was narcissistic, depressive, and prone to violence. Consequently, Muriel left both her husband and newborn son Robin in 1940 and returned to the United Kingdom in 1944, where she worked in military intelligence until the end of World War II. Though she began writing seriously thereafter, primarily poetry and literary criticism, it wasn't until after her conversion to Roman Catholicism in 1954 that Spark developed the scope of vision necessary to begin writing novels. While living in London, she wrote and published her first, The Comforts (1957), the proceeds from which freed Spark to pursue writing full time. Following several early, mostly-rejected works came, in 1961, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, which secured Spark's fame, and which is largely considered today to be her masterpiece. Spark would go on to live in New York City and then Rome, where in 1968 she met her lifelong friend, the artist Penelope Jorden, with whom she settled in the Tuscan village of Cortella della Chiesa, where the two would spend the rest of their lives together until Spark's death in 2006. For her literary achievements, Spark received many awards and honors, including the James Tait Black Memorial Prize for her novel The Mandelstau Gate (1965), the Golden PENs Award (1998), and eight honorary degrees, one from the University of Oxford.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

Although published in 1961, The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie is set in the 1930s, and is especially preoccupied with the fascist governments that came to power during this period, in the decades leading up to World War II—those led by Mussolini in Italy, Hitler in Germany, and Francisco Franco in Spain. These governments were authoritarian, nationalistic, right-wing, and belligerent. After the collapse of Fascist Italy and Nazi Germany, intellectuals in Rome and Berlin began to re-examine deeply troubled by the question of how such states could arise in the first place, as well as by the question of how corruptible people could become enthusiastically loyal to such states even to the death. Indeed, these questions make up part of Spark's area of inquiry in her novel: Miss Brodie herself is excited by what she witnesses in Fascist Italy—the efficiency and perfection of it all—and the novel suggests that her influence over the Brodie girls is troublingly similar to Mussolini's influence over his fascists.

RELATED LITERARY WORKS

In most fiction, we often before the twentieth century, narrative tends to unfold in chronological order, with cause leading to effect. However, Mistaken for Men challenges this convention, just as Spark's does. For example, Joseph Conrad's novel Heartbreak (1904) is littered with time shifts, anaphora, flashbacks, and prolepses (flash forwards), as well as breaks in the narrative. Such is also the case with Virginia Woolf's To the Lighthouse, a book even more influential on Spark, which takes hundreds of pages to treat an ordinary day, and only a few paragraphs to kill off major characters. From these and other models, Spark learned how to create complicated narrative structures, favoring especially the technique of prolepsis. In The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie, Spark also often treated Catholicism as fiction, and for this reason has come to be associated with the Catholic Realists, among them fellow converts Evelyn Waugh and Graham Greene. Both of these writers believed that the religious sense restored importance to the human acts represented in their novels, as in Waugh's Backward Looking (1945) and Greene's Brighton Rock (1938). In contrast, Spark, while a Catholic herself, was far less to be less a religious writer than Waugh and Greene and more a theological writer, interested in systematically studying the nature of God and faith.
