In order to create all different types of cells, certain sequences of DNA (genes) must be turned on in some cells and not in others. For example, a nerve cell does not need the gene for skin pigment, so this gene is switched off in nerve cells and switched on in skin cells.

1.2 The Cell as a Living System

1.2.1 Homeostasis

- Cells must maintain temperature, blood sugar(glucose), water, and pH (using buffers) at certain levels. This ability to maintain is called homeostasis. Homeostasis is necessary for life and also includes removing toxins and moving the body to avoid danger or to find food, water, or a mate.
- Cell Transport
  - Materials move into and out of cells using two processes.
  - Passive transport is random and involves materials moving from high to low concentration. When materials move in this way, resulting in an equal distribution inside and outside the cell, it is called diffusion. Osmosis is the diffusion of water.
  - Active transport involves moving materials against their concentration- low to high. This process requires energy. Muscle contraction uses active transport to pump sodium and potassium into and out of the muscle cells. (1/3 of all the body's ATP fuels this sodium-potassium pump.)
