

Part 1: Terminology

Stoichiometry is the study of quantity relationships in a chemical reaction. There are always given information about one substance in the reactants and asked for information about another substance. The "recipe" that controls substances that react substances is saying the balanced ratio. Always a reactant is measured out in a laboratory, the amount of product is called the actual yield. The amount of product expected to be formed based on working the problem and mathematically is called the theoretical yield. To calculate the percent yield, you divide the actual yield by the theoretical yield, and then multiply by 100 percent. When looking at a chemical reaction, the substance that runs out first is called the limiting reactant, and the substance that has some left over is called the excess reactant.
