

MicroMeasurement Lab

Background: As you now have discovered, a microscope, as the name implies, is used to observe very small structures. Exactly how small are these objects? Since using a ruler is not possible, we can't really measure them directly. Is it possible to use the microscope to help us determine the dimensions of such a small object? Let's investigate...

Two metric units are useful when measuring small objects:

1 meter (m) = 1,000 millimeters (mm) and 1mm = 1,000 micrometers, or microns (μm)

Purpose: to learn how to measure using a compound light microscope.

- to measure the diameter of the low-power field
- to calculate the diameter of the high power field
- to measure specimens on prepared slides

Procedure: The following procedure is utilized to perform this experience:

1. Obtain a clear plastic ruler.
2. Look through the ocular at 40X and focus on the edge of the ruler using the coarse adjustment. Adjust the ruler so that the view in the low power field is similar to what you see in the figure below. Be sure you are looking at the cm/mm side of the ruler!

3. Adjust the slide so that the edge of one mark is at the left side of the field of view and the ruler is at the "equator" of your field of view (the illustration above isn't quite lined up correctly). You want the measurement of the diameter of the circle!
4. Note that 1 millimeter is the distance from the middle of one mark to the middle of the next mark. What is the diameter measurement of your 40X field of view? Estimate to the nearest tenth of a millimeter:
5. Now using the skills you have learned previously, convert the measurement from millimeters to microns (show your work):
6. We can't use the same method to determine the diameter of the high power field of view. Why not? Try it out, then write the reason below:
