

X. Conclusion

In his essay on "Reasonable Reasons in Contractualist Moral Argument", Kumar (2003) points out that Contractualism is unclear as to what situations warrant a consideration for morality, and what principles evoked by said situations are relevant to be examined (p. 8).

individual's moral reasoning. Scanlon believes that every individual possesses the ability to "assess reasons and justifications". Thus each individual is to treat every other individual such as they are both capable of making these moral assessments of actions. This elicits a "mutual recognition" or agreement on what acts are wrong or right between individuals (Ashford, 2007).
