

Essays: Spanish Language

Essay 1

Does the language you speak reflect your personal and cultural Identity? The United States of America is one of the most diverse countries in the world and for that reason there are many different languages spoken. Most people who move to this land of opportunities are required to learn the primary language, English. By learning the language of the new world they have entered, they are slowly giving up the culture and language from which they came from. People who have trouble learning English and changing according to the American culture are often looked down upon. In Richard Rodriguez's, "Aria: A Memoir of a Bilingual Childhood" we see how the author struggles to find his public identity and in Gloria Anzaldúa's, "How to show more content... As she gets older she starts to appreciate her language more, discovering Chicano writers and watching Mexican movies. She starts to feel like she belongs to a community and sticks up for her language because it is a part of her. It is interesting how Anzaldúa's suddenly starts writing in Spanish. According to me she addresses this when she says "and as long as I have to accommodate the English speakers rather than having them accommodate me, my tongue will be illegitimate." When saying this and writing in the broken way that she has, she is making her language legitimate and relevant. Her teachers try to take her accent away but she talks about how that would be taking a part of her away. People are different around their family and in public meaning that they have dual identities. Anzaldúa says that bilingual people cannot completely identify to their native people's culture and they cannot identify to the American culture completely so they develop two identities. Another main idea in this essay is that even though she is adopting the American culture she does not believe that it requires her to forget her own culture. She shows how closely tied her language and identity are when she says 'I am my language'. Both of these essays are about people who move to America at a young age and struggle with finding their public identity and keeping their individual identity alive. They both slowly lose their Spanish but do
