

Oxfam Discussion Paper on Intellectual Property and the Knowledge Gap
December 2001

This paper discusses the impact of intellectual property rules in the developing world, and possible campaign strategies to change them. These rules matter because they affect people's access to medicines, seeds and educational materials, and the ability of poor countries to develop and participate effectively in global markets. Oxfam hopes that the paper will be a useful contribution to others working on the issue, and will prompt feedback for its own work on WTO patent rules.

Section 1 - The problem

1. The rules

One of the most intense struggles in the campaign to reform globalisation concerns the control of knowledge. Will knowledge be monopolised by corporate interests for private profit, and shaped by the markets of rich consumers, or will it be kept within the public domain, and used to help end poverty, hunger, and disease? At a time when millions of people are deprived of basic rights to health, food and education, and inequality is growing, this question could not be more critical.

The World Trade Organisation's TRIPS Agreement, introduced in 1995 after intense corporate lobbying, is at the centre of this controversy. It is the main international treaty determining rights over intellectual property (IP), which includes patents, copyright and trademarks.

TRIPS obliges all WTO members to grant patent-holders - which are mainly large Northern-based corporations - temporary monopolies for their 'inventions'. This system is supposed to stimulate innovation, as it allows patent-holders to prevent competition, raise prices and thereby recoup the costs of their investment.

Bilateral trade agreements such as the Free Trade Area of the Americas (FTAA) are also being used to ratchet up national IP standards to even higher levels than those required by TRIPS.

All these rules will affect the lives of billions of people, yet until recently they have been introduced with minimal public debate.
