

Abdominal Cavity

INSTRUCTION: Use Figure 2.28 as a guide for making the necessary cuts through the branch apices to separate the digestive organs in the abdominal cavity. Using scissors, begin by making a vertical incision from the base of the ventrally-lying the ventral midline to the dorsal aspect of the gizzard opening (Fig. 2.28a). Make lateral incisions along the base of the rib branch on each side of and in front, make lateral incisions to each side of the backbone around the gizzard base and just in front of the pharynx. Preserved specimens contain large amounts of liquid preservative in their body cavities. You may wish to drain those out of your specimens, or use a paper towel or sponge to remove them before proceeding with the dissection of the digestive system.

A thin, muscular layer (the diaphragm) separates the upper stomach cavity from the lower abdominal cavity (Figs. 4.33–4.35). The rest of the diaphragm will be discussed in Chapter 6. For now, concentrate your effort to patiently see the structures in the abdominal cavity flow from the esophagus past down the diaphragm and into the stomach. The diaphragm is a narrow tube containing smooth muscle that contracts to push food into the stomach. The stomach lies on the left side of the abdominal cavity; the large, dark liver is on the right. Perhaps you find it surprising that storing large quantities of food, gathering materials of the food to eat constantly, a large stomach permits the ability to consume greater quantities of food in a short time span, and then return to a safe place to digest the meal over several hours. The stomach releases several chemical components that assist the digestive process including hydrochloric acid and pepsinogen.

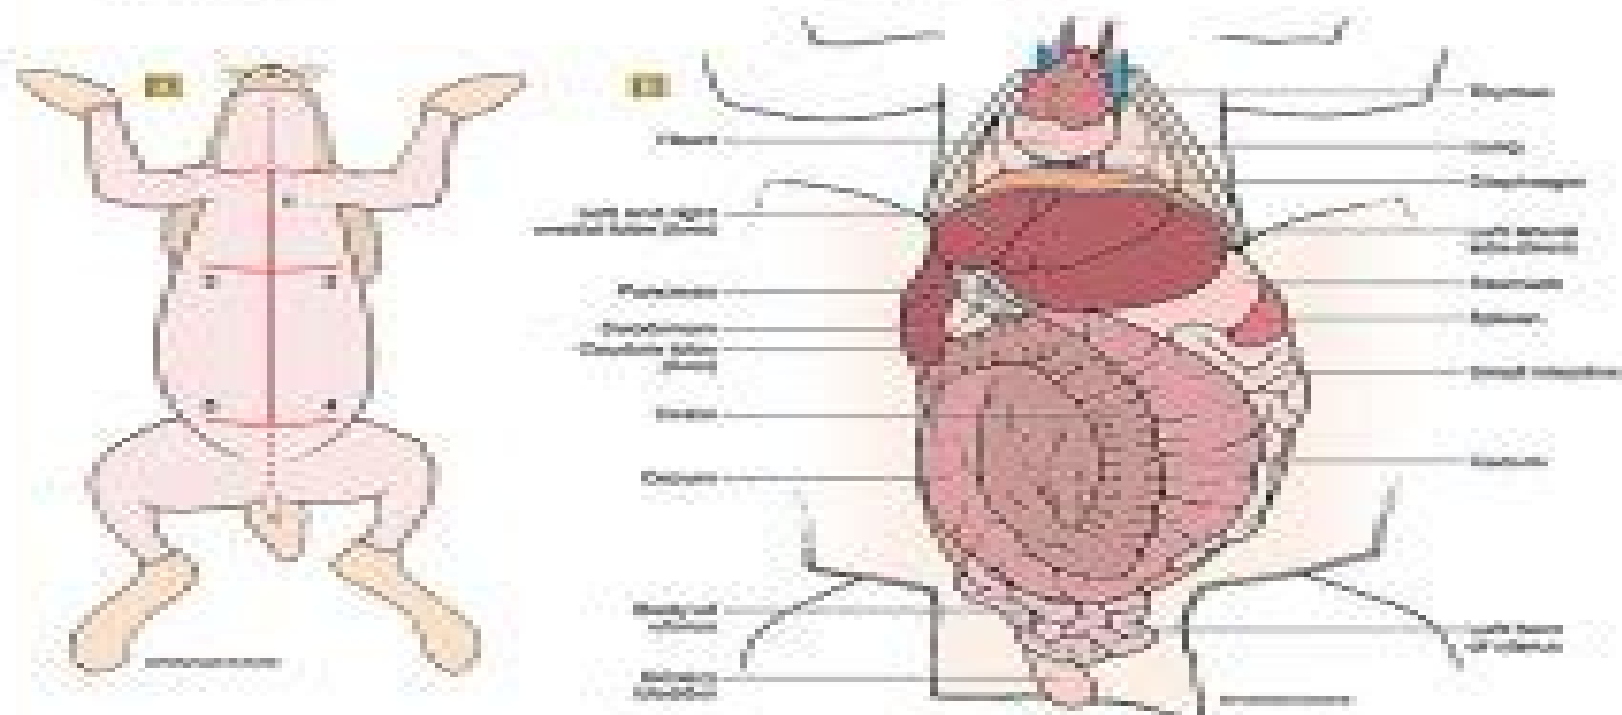

Fig. 7 is a plot of the number of neurons for responding interneurons against the number of neurons of the muscle activity and abdominal activity.
