Radiation management and credentialing of fluoroscopy users

Published online: 22 July 2006

Abstract During the last 15 years, developments in X-ray technologies have substantially improved the ability of practitioners to treat patients using fluoroscopically guided interventional techniques. Many of these procedures require a greater use of fluoroscopy and more recording of images. This increases the potential for radiation-induced dermatitis and epilation, as well as severe radiation-induced burns to patients. Many fluoroscope operators are untrained in radiation management and do not realize that these procedures increase the risk of radiation injury and radiation-induced cancer in personnel as well as patients. The hands of long-time fluoroscope operators in some cases exhibit radiation damage—especially when sound radiation protection practices have not been followed. In response, the Center for Devices and Radiological Health of the United States Food and Drug Administration has issued an Advisory calling for proper training of operators. Hospitals and administrators need to support and enforce the need for this training by requiring documentation of credentials in radiation management as a prerequisite for obtaining fluoroscopy privileges. A concerted effort on the part of professional medical organizations and regulatory agencies will be required to train fluoroscopy users to prevent physicians from unwittingly imparting serious radiation injuries to their patients.

Introduction

During the last 15 years, developments in X-ray technologies have substantially improved the ability of practitioners to treat patients using fluoroscopically guided interventional techniques. Many of these procedures require a greater use of fluoroscopy and serial imaging (cine). This has increased the potential for radiation-induced dermatitis and epilation, as well as severe radiation-induced burns to patients. In fact, several multimillion-dollar judgments have recently been awarded to plaintiffs following such injuries, and many more cases are in litigation.

In response, the Center for Devices and Radiological Health of the United States Food and Drug Administration issued an Advisory [1] warning health-care facilities of the potential for radiation-induced burns to patients from fluoroscopic procedures. A separate article cites the growing number of cases of severe injury [2]. To date, the FDA has documented about 100 cases of radiation-induced burns. European investigations have confirmed at least 15 cases of radiation dermatitis that resulted from cardiological procedures [3–6]. Additional case histories of injuries to both patients and physicians have appeared in the literature [7–9]. Some of the radiation-induced injuries discussed in these studies have required skin grafts resulting in permanent disfigurement. Cataracts and serious radiation injuries to hands have also been observed in physicians who have recently (as late as 1994) started using fluoroscopy in their practice [10].

Fluoroscopy users must realize that these high-dose procedures increase the risk of radiation injury and radiation-induced cancer in personnel as well as patients. We describe here positive, proactive steps that can be taken to credential fluoroscopists in radiation management and thereby help to prevent such injuries.
