Project Hopes to Recreate the Smells of Old Europe

How does the project work?

- There are several scents joined together to recreate smells which are designed to recreate different smells.
- They help us learn about all the different smells.

Have you ever wondered what things in the past would smell like?

Well, a new project does and they're looking for help to recreate the past through the sense of smell.

A project called 'Scentopia' has been launched. It's a website to make smells from Europe from the year 1600.

The aim is to help people enjoy history through their nose.

Dr. William Davis, from Temple College, University of Exeter, is the founder of the project. He said, "Smell is central to our daily lives today, but it has also been central to the way we have lived for centuries. The project is about today."

They want you to help you understand the past.

The first step for the project is to create a list of smells (10). It will be made through a survey of different languages in the European region.

It will also create a map from the time for the past with a map of the world.

All of the information will help them to create a list of smells.

They want you to help them. They'll create a list of 100 smells from history. In 2021, the project hopes to create a list of 100 smells from history. They hope the list will be a list of people to help us enjoy of what the world of the past would have been like. The list will be a list of 100 smells.

Helping you will be one of the people who'll help them to create a list of 100 smells.
