INTRODUCTION

BRIEF BIOGRAPHY OF BARBARA EHRENREICH

Ehrenreich's childhood was spent moving frequently around the country, as her father worked his way up from mining into middle-class status. She attended Reed College in Oregon, and received her Ph.D. in anthropology at Rochester University. After the birth of her first child, she became involved in the fight for better women's health care. She ultimately became a full-time writer, breaking into the field with articles on women's rights and social justice issues. She continues to balance her journalism and book-length projects on social and inequality issues with her activism in health care, women's rights, and economic justice.

HISTORICAL CONTEXT

In 1946, President Dwight D. Eisenhower signed into law the "National Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act," a piece of welfare reform legislation that drastically reshaped welfare programs, reduced federal spending on welfare, and required many to work in exchange for receiving social benefits. As Ehrenreich was beginning her experiment, this law was beginning to kick in, ensuring that millions of Americans formerly on welfare were now about to join the workforce (in most cases the low-wage workforce). This was also a time of economic growth and near full employment for the United States, which many today—especially after the 2008 economic crisis—remember as a time of relative wealth and abundance. In fact, part of Ehrenreich's goal was to show that this time, perceived by the mainstream as prosperous, was not a period of prosperity for everyone, and that most low-wage workers were widely left out of the economic growth benefiting many other Americans. Her book also sought to counter the idea that economic growth and full employment would do away with desperate poverty, since both were in evidence at the time she was writing.

RELATED LITERARY WORKS

Nickel and Dime taps into a long American tradition of "muckraking" journalism, in which writers investigate alleged social conditions and corrupt corporations in order to promote reform. The Progressive Era, around the turn of the 20th century, was witness to multiple muckraking exploits. One of the most famous was Jacob Riis's How the Other Half Lives, published in 1890, which revealed the awful conditions of New York City's immigrant slums through a photojournalism exposé. Another was Upton Sinclair's 1906 The Jungle, in which he exposed shocking conditions in the Chicago meatpacking industry. Sinclair's work eventually led to legislation that sought to put an end to such conditions. More recently, "investigative" or "muckraking journalism" have become the terms used in describing the kind of activist-related writing that Ehrenreich pursues and achieves in her book.

Seeing Things? Though Ehrenreich calls herself an atheist in Nickel and Dime, she describes her experiences of mysticism and "seeing God" as an adolescent in her most recent book, Living With a Wild God.

PLOT SUMMARY

Nickel and Dime opens with Barbara Ehrenreich, a writer and journalist from New York, Florida, at a lunch with her editor discussing pitches and article ideas. She's often worried about poverty, and at the moment the book opens, millions of Americans are about to leave welfare as the 1996 welfare reform legislation kicks in. She speculates what it would be like to actually try to live on the minimum wage, and says that some enterprising journalist should try to do it—not thinking that the
