

What are molecular signalling and cellular signalling systems?

Answer:

The cell-signalling system includes not only signalling molecules, but part of components both producing signalling molecules and/or receiving them. In other words, the signalling system consists of a signal source, which produces signalling molecules, and a signal receptor, which receives the signalling molecules. The signal molecules are produced by the signalling cells and travel through the extracellular space to the target cells. The signalling molecules bind to the target cells and trigger a series of events, which lead to the target cells responding to the signal.
