

The significance of regular clocking scheme is unavoidable in the fabrication of logic circuit in QCA technology. The concept was initially reported in [44–46] but fails to prove its efficiency and completeness. Initially, a two-dimensional clocking scheme is formally proposed but it retains the issue in violating feedback loop [49]. The clocking in [50] have addressed the issue with an implementation approach using multi-layer crossover. Thus, multi-layer QCA circuit did not get any significance due to its fabrication complexity. Also, intuitively, a complex wire crossing based design with three-dimensional information flow was proposed in [51]. However, the wire crossing increases in the underlying clocking circuit due to the complex layout for clock zone 3 in [51]. These points have a notable impact on the buildability of the circuit and demands a flexible, scalable and robust clocking scheme with reduced complexity in fabrication.

On the other hand, several synthesis methodologies in QCA layout for comparator have been explored. Some of them are not robust [35, 40] and some of them are multi-layer based designs [33, 34, 37] making them practically difficult to fabricate. A complex crossover based design layout is proposed in [32, 36, 38]. However, to the best of knowledge of the authors, no comparator has been noticed till date to have designed incorporating underlying regular clocking. Moreover, cost efficiency and power awareness of the design is important along with regular clocking for a complete real time fabrication [45, 42].

The above discussed issues, point to the necessity of realistic design of digital circuit in QCA is still in infancy and needs proper research in that direction. Hence, all these factors motivate us to realize a comparator circuit in QCA incorporating a proper underlying clocking circuit. This paper proposes a power aware, cost efficient comparator without less wire-crossing using an efficient and scalable underlying regular clocking scheme which are discussed more details later in this article. The most prominent contribution of this research is follows:

A novel comparator circuit is proposed and the cost effectiveness of the proposed design is evaluated. A new regular clocking scheme is introduced and utilized in the extension of the proposed comparator. The significant challenge of the augmentation of the underlying clocking circuit is reported.

The evaluation and performance analysis of the design is presented which outperform the existing works in the literature. The functionality of the proposed comparator has been verified by QCA-APro tool. The power analysis have been carried out by QCA-Pro tool. The rest of the paper is organized in the following manner: The proposed comparator and its realizations in QCA is being illustrated in Section 2. The next Section 3 deals with the simulated result, comparative discussion, cost efficiency and power dissipation analysis of the proposed logic. Finally, in Section 4, conclusion are drawn.

2. RESEARCH METHOD

The comparator design presented in [37] used two 3-input majority gate along with one 2-input majority gate. Both the 3-input majority gates used one inverted input and output besides a number of inverters from the second 3-input majority gate to the 2-input majority. Moreover, all the inputs are used repeatedly instead of using them single time and make a wire to connect them to the other majority gate. This layout could avoid the crossover but failed to produce a robust and efficient design. In the proposed design in [34, 37] a simple and compact design can be observed. However, both the layouts have used multi-layer cross over which not only increases the complexity of the design but also buildability overhead increases. The constraint of wire-crossing was resolved in the designs proposed in [32, 36], where the cross over based on rotated cell (90° and 45°-cell) were used which still has the same impact on fabrication. An optimized design with normal cell based and wire crossing less layout claims to be achieved in area, cell complexity proposed in [36]. None of them did considered the proper layout of the underlying clocking scheme and it motivated us to design a regular clock based comparator rather follows the rule of considering number of cells in a clocking zone.

2.1. Design method of comparator and its QCA layout

A binary comparator, an essential combinational circuit in logic design is extensively used in central processing unit (CPU), ALU circuit and micro-controllers. It compares two numbers and returns whether a number (say A) is greater (A>B), lesser (A<B) or equal to (A=B) the other number (say B) as formulated in Table 1. In this section, a QCA technology based efficient single layer comparator design is proposed. The block diagram and the logic function for the comparator is represented in Figure 2 and (1) respectively.

$$F(A, B) = [A + B, A + B, A + B] \quad (1)$$

where, A and B are the inputs to the composite gate. From the truth Table 1, the outputs of the comparator can be expressed as following (2):

$$F(A > B) = A, B$$
