

Point Of View Analysis

The Importance of One's Point of View Imagine a trial where the jury bases a punishment off of one side of the issue. Unfair, right? We, humans go through almost the exact same thing. Humans judge people and situations without even taking another person's point of view into consideration. Not putting oneself into another's shoes can lead to relationship issues, lifelong regrets, and misjudgments. A girl's best friend tells her every day that a really cute guy in one of her classes thinks that her best friend is so hot and that he wants to get to know her. The girl is fine with it because she thinks he's cute too, but she doesn't know him well so she doesn't want to be with him. Her best friend always says that the girl and the cute guy from her first hour should date, so the girl feels like her friend is encouraging the relationship. She tries it; she doesn't know what to do because she doesn't feel "the spark" of the relationship. The friend that got the two together is mad at her friend for talking to him because she had talked to him before, also. The friend that's with the guy misinterpreted everything and has now lost a best friend so...show more content...

When one does not know another's perspective, it can lead to misjudgment of him or her. What if a homeless person was sitting on the side of the road asking for a place to stay or for even as little as some spare change? Depending on the person, one may think to themselves "The person is just lazy; maybe they should learn to fend for themselves," or some negative comment. Another might think "Awh, poor guy, he really needs someone; he may need some help." No matter who is correct out of the two not knowing one side of the story may cause one to judge or misjudge. Maybe that homeless person got fired, or kicked out of the house, or even in a terrible family-related situation. One may never know, and until he or she does, harsh judgment shouldn't be
