

Paper Example on Gender Equality and Women Empowerment Essay

Introduction

In both developed and developing nations, there is a more significant limitation of female potential because the society has not fully recognized the efforts made by females in creating a community where collective responsibility is a priority. This is further compounded in developing countries where women are forced to play minor roles. For a very long time, the focus of the civil society has been to promote human rights, respect, and social justice. The civil society relies on its diversity meaning that it addresses different issues and accepts members from various quotas. To promote gender equality, the civil society has to be representative in its approach to issues. Allowing people to form associations, movements, and networks is the best way to build a democratic society which to a greater extent is based on common ideals and values.

Democratic nations have achieved a high level of legal equality through the mechanisms of citizenship. However, the mechanisms do not empower women because of the cultural, social, and economic constraints. Initially, people thought that civil society was the ultimate solution to underrepresentation and inequality. However, currently, the focus is on a collective approach that brings every aspect of nation-building on board. To a larger extent, the society has made progress on matters equality. The disparities in the level of men's and women's participation in social, political, and economic life are accounted for by patriarchal attitudes and the beliefs regarding the roles and responsibilities of women in most cultures. The UN convention bases its review mechanisms on the principles of equality, state obligation, and non-discrimination. There is the need to help vulnerable women to exercise their economic rights better and at the same time strengthen their capacity to better use their right to social participation.

Research Question

What is the responsibility of the civil society entities as far as gender equality and women empowerment are concerned?

Theory of Change

It is critical to review the theory of change in an effort to ensure that the civil society remains relevant and practical to the needs of the community at all time. Change is the ability to develop one's body and mind. The education process is the first step towards empowering women because it prepares them with a wide set of skills that can be used for economic gains. Women should be empowered to decide for themselves in the sense that they should be encouraged to take charge of their future. When women are in a position to project their demands, they will step out and use their skills to create economic opportunities.

The civil society entities have been critical in effecting the change in policies. Currently, various entities are active in formulating and implementation of different programs. The theory of change takes multiple forms such as network diagrams, logic models, various forms of narratives, and
