

The attack on the 'Twin Towers' in New York city and the Pentagon in Washington city marked a turning point in History, just as the events that caused the Two World Wars did! After September 11th, a worldwide movement, which expressed a hatred revolt against such repugnant events, took place. Today, at the beginning of the year 2003, and for the second time in History, we are facing an almost inevitable attack against Iraq, which is believed (invariably by the Americans) to produce and hide highly dangerous and lethal chemical weapons. Such attack could, then, cause what many conjecture as a Third World War.

In this new emerging world order, era, strongly dominated by the 'terrorism concern', one should, nevertheless, analyse how governments deal and treat such phenomenon! Many identify, and I surely agree with those, that there is a paradox in the way governments see and treat acts of 'terror'. Greisman, for example, points "a paradox that follows acts of 'terrorism': individual, or non-state, terrorism, is generally seen as evil, while official, or legitimate, terrorism is relatively accepted (Greisman, 1977: 304). Others, like Hocking, talk about the use of the term 'terrorism' as a political strategy by the governments. In other words, they say that the term was invented by western nations as a form of challenging and confronting the tremendous cultural power of certain regions of the world.

Another term that is directly linked and related to 'terrorism' is 'counterterrorism'. Some argue that rather than being considered a discrete phenomenon worthy of analysis in its own right, the term has commonly been defined only in terms of its apparently reactive relationship to 'terrorism'. In other words, according to such theory, the term 'counterterrorism' represents a mere reflection of a natural reaction by governments which were victims of 'terrorists' deeds.

In Hocking's perception though, and in a large extent I corroborate with her words, 'terrorism', rather than being the basis for the existence of the term 'counterterrorism', actually, it extols a process that goes the other way around. In other words, Hocking suggests that 'counterterrorism' is not defined by its relationship to 'terrorism', but rather, 'terrorism' is defined by its relationship to 'counterterrorism'. 'Terrorism' is, then, in fact, defined only by a reaction to it, that is to say that 'terrorism' is an invented, used and manipulated term by governments, as well as a mere outcome of 'counterterrorism' measures. To quote her words:
