Services for people with neurological conditions Great Britain: Parliament: House of Commons: Committee of Public Accounts, Margaret Hodge, 2012-03-16 Approximately two million people in the United Kingdom have a neurological condition including Parkinson s disease motor neurone disease or multiple sclerosis But individual care is often poorly coordinated and the quality of services received depends on where you live Some areas simply don t have enough expertise both in hospitals and the community In 2005 the Department for Health launched a new Framework to provide services for people with a neurological condition There have been some improvements such as a reduction in waiting times But unlike the strategies for Cancer and Stroke the model used to implement the Framework hasn t worked For this clinical area the Department left the implementation to local health commissioners but gave them no leadership at all and set no clear targets It set no baselines and failed to monitor progress and so could not hold them to account where things went wrong The present Government needs to understand what went wrong here for the future Health spending on neurological conditions increased by nearly 40 per cent in three years Over much the same period emergency admissions have risen by 32 per cent and readmissions to hospital within 28 days have increased from 11.2 per cent to 14 per cent The Department is moving towards a decentralised health and social care landscape In doing so it must set clear objectives for joint health and social care outcomes and services for people with neurological conditions
