ABSTRACT

Assessment has played a major role in family systems work. Assessment methods can apply as a guide in order to understand of functioning patterns in family unit by family counselors. The assessment process is an essential step in guiding decisions regarding the suitable interventions strategies. This paper reviews the different literature of assessment methods in family counseling, consequently explained, and compared the various models of marriage, couple and family assessments.

Key words: Assessment; Family; Counseling

INTRODUCTION

Assessment in counseling is methods of collecting important information about person and his family. According to Kline (2000) assessment used to help understand and predict behavior. Usually assessment involves multiple methods, such as history interviews of person and family, behavioral observations, and formal tests, for gathering information about family (McIntire & Miller, 2006). Family counseling without assessment is like to a car trip without a map. The counselor needs to know where are has been family? Where is now? The next what direction they want to go? (Deacon & Piercy, 2001).

Clients come to couples and family counselors for a diversity of reasons. Some may seek premarital counseling to help prepare for an upcoming marriage. Other may want to find ways to deal more effectively with a child who is acting out. Still others may seek couples counseling to understand why they feel distanced from each other after years of marriage. In each of these cases, professional counselors can use assessment techniques effectively for to gather information, develop hypotheses, evaluate treatment progress and outcomes, and facilitate change.

Therefore accurate assessment of family relationships and functioning is a significant matter in treatment interventions for couples, families and children. However in family interventions as individual psychotherapy, the success of treatment plan often depends on careful assessment of the nature of the problem and potential for solution (Bray, 2009). Generally in previous several decades the assessment methods were typically designed as individually, not an entire family. While the assessing couples and families differ in a number of ways from assessing individuals. Rather than assessing individual constructs, family counselors focus on assessing the family system. On the other word family relationships, patterns, structure and level of functioning are the primary areas of focus. The counselors evaluate dynamic systems, so this process can be more challenging than individual assessment (Erford, 2006). Bray (2009) pointed that family assessment is a systematic method that provides a strong source of information. This information can be used to grow initial hypotheses about the nature of the problem, the causes of the problem, family members' perceptions of the problem, and potential areas of strength. In addition assessment in counseling can be applied to evaluate the family's progress. Finally it can be used for evaluate outcomes at the end of counseling (Hawley, 1994).

In the other word to providing information, measuring progress, and evaluating outcomes, the assessment process can facilitate change. Counselors can use assessment to help
