

The first two lessons of this final unit which are Features of Academic Writing and Strategies for Effective Interpersonal Communication have already paved the way for you to easily compose your own academic writing. This time, since you have learned that academic writing requires deep evaluation of information to come up with factual evidences, you are going to discover how to measure the worth, truthfulness, and accuracy of every information present on different resources, especially in the world wide web.

Ready to study this lesson? Note that you are expected to work on and complete all the learning tasks of this lesson for 5 school days. Let's Do That Task, must be accomplished on or before May 21, 2022. Make sure to attend the virtual class where the lesson will be deeply explained.

LESSON OBJECTIVES

At the end of this learning packet, you will be able to:

- determine the worth of ideas mentioned in the text;
- examine the truthfulness and accuracy of the materials; and
- make judgments of the worth, truthfulness, and accuracy of the materials viewed or listened to.

LET'S DISCOVER!

Have you ever tried researching for a particular topic in the internet and compare the information you have gathered with those information from books? What have you noticed? Numerous websites, applications, and software brought by technology does not always guarantee valuable, truthful, and accurate information.

Aside from honing your writing skills, let us also develop your researching skills by learning how to filter information from various resources.

WORTH

Worth tells the essence of ideas of a text, material, or source. However, note that not all relevant information are worth included. Be guided with these terms in determining the worth of ideas.

1. Useful – Try to figure out if including that information or idea can contribute and clarify your point in writing.
2. Updated – the worth of information will be lessened once it is past a decade or more since there will be more relevant researches released at the present.
