25. In contrast to centrally represented words, the word-form frequency effect is stronger for words that are processed in the lexicon than for words that are processed in the orthography. This suggests that the orthographic frequency effect is stronger for words that are processed in the orthography than for words that are processed in the lexicon. This is consistent with the idea that the orthographic frequency effect is a result of the orthographic frequency of the word-form, while the word-form frequency effect is a result of the frequency of the word in the lexicon.
