A nursing performance evaluation is a written assessment of a nurse's work performance. Also known as a performance appraisal, the evaluation is typically done on a regular basis, which may be quarterly, semi-annually, or annually. A supervisor will generally evaluate the performance of his employee, and the review will then be interpreted by a boss or manager. All aspects of work will be reviewed, including work habits and ethics.

Performance reviews are a common procedure used by employers in many professions. A nursing performance evaluation will typically be documented on a paper form, which will typically be hand signed by the appraiser, as well as the nurse. An evaluation form will include a field for comments in most cases as well. Work habits and performance may be rated using a number system. Typically, "1" may be the poorest or unsatisfactory rating, with a "5" being the highest performance rating.

The ratings listed on a nursing performance evaluation will typically be broken down into categories. Over the course of her employment, a nurse's supervisors will observe her work habits and make note of her strengths and weaknesses. When preparing an evaluation, the supervisor will review how well the nurse completes her assignments, and note areas of improvement on which the nurse needs to focus.

In many cases, a nursing evaluation will document the attendance record of the employee. It may list how many days the nurse was absent from her work, with or without reasonable cause. The
