Excerpt from book 22: THE DANES CHAPTER III THE DANES Battle of Armagh Heroic Conduct and Death of Niall III Horrible Cruelties of Turgesius Stratagem of the Monarch Malachy Death of the Tyrant General Destruction of the Danes. We have now come to a period in our history when a new era of suffering opened on this country by adding the miseries attendant on a foreign invasion to the horrors of domestic strife. In the eighth century hordes of Danes, Norwegians and other northern nations rushed from their inhospitable deserts to plunder and if possible form establishments in the more fertile regions of the South. France, England and Scotland were greatly harassed by these barbarians and towards the close of the century bodies of them disembarked on various parts of the Irish coast. They penetrated the country, seized immense plunder and with merciless rage killed all the inhabitants who fell into their power. Amongst many other depredations in Ulster they destroyed the famous abbey of Bangor and put the monks nine hundred in number to the sword, but the massacre of these good men was soon avenged by the king of that country who destroyed twelve hundred of the barbarians and drove the remainder to their ships. The people of Leinster and Munster also defeated the invaders in several encounters but after thus for several years bravely repelling them from their coasts, their own fatal intestine commotions at length rendered the Irish an easy prey to this ruthless enemy. Hugh V who then reigned over Ireland and the provincial kings instead of uniting their strength to resist the common foe by whom they were so terribly harassed, were continually quarrelling amongst themselves and the consequences proved horribly
