Respect

In this paper I will argue that respect, when earned, is more stable, more specific, and allows for a better relationship than when respect is simply demanded. Respect has been a major issue throughout time. Towns and countries alike were crushed simply for disrespecting their invaders. Vlad Dracul, a Transylvanian ruler most feared for his barbaric behavior used to cut off the heads of nonconformist villagers and place them on stakes outside his castle. The reason this issue is so important is because if respect is unjustly demanded by everyone, everywhere, all the time, the idea of respect, will be cheapened and true respect will become almost worthless. The supporting arguments that can be made for my thesis are as show more content. This point clearly shows that earned respect forms a better relationship than demanded respect since now that the people can respect the officers, they will have better communication.

When respect is earned it is more specific than demanded respect. If you respect someone for a specific talent, but don't actually think they are a good person, you can say that they have earned respect for their talent, but not for their character. A second example of this would be River Phoenix, who earned respect for his outstanding acting abilities, but was disrespected for his drug habit. This point supports my thesis because if respect is demanded it does not specify what is being respected. It is important that respect be specific because, as shown above, a person cannot always be respected universally.

It is ineffective to assume that if you demand respect, you will automatically get it. If it is assumed that respect will be given on command, or if respect is forced onto people it makes them reluctant to respect, and stunts the growth of any earned respect. Respect is normally demanded through fear, but the fear is not actually respect. One example of this is Czar Nicholas II. His respect was
