The Wheat Princess Jean Webster,2014-09-04 excerpt from PROLOGUE IF you leave the city by the Porta Maggiore and take the ViaPr nestina which leads east into the Sabine hills at some thirty sixkilometers distance from Rome you will pass on your left a grey walledvillage climbing up the hillside This is Palestrina the old RomanPr neste and a short distance beyond also on the left you will findbranching off from the straight Roman highway a steep mountain road which if you stick to it long enough will take you after manywindings to Castel Madama and Tivoli Several kilometers along this road you will see shooting up from a barecrag above you a little stone hamlet crowned by the ruins of amediaeval fortress The town Castel Vivalanti was built in the dayswhen a stronghold was more to be thought of than a water supply andits people from habit or love or perhaps sheer necessity have livedon there ever since going down in the morning to their work in theplain and toiling up at night to their homes on the hill So steep isits site that the doorway of one house looks down on the roof of thehouse below and its narrow stone streets are in reality flights ofstairs The only approach is from the front by a road which winds andunwinds like a serpent and leads at last to the Porta della Luna through which all of the traffic enters the town The gate isornamented with the crest of the Vivalanti a phoenix rising out of the flame supported by a heavy machicolated top from which in the old days stones and burning oil might be dropped upon the heads of the unwelcome guests. The town is a picturesque little affair; it would be hard to find a place more so in the Sabine villages; it is very very poor. In the march of the centuries it has fallen out of step and been left far behind to look at it one would scarcely dream that on the clear day the walls and towers of modern Rome are in sight on the horizon. But in its time Castel Vivalanti was not insignificant. This little hamlet has entertained history within its walls. It has bodily outfaced robber barons and papal troops. It has been besieged and conquered and alas betrayed and that by its own prince. Twice has it been razed to the ground and twice rebuilt. In one way or another though it has weathered the centuries and it stands to day grey and forlorn clustering about the walls of its donjon and keep. Castel Vivalanti as in the middle ages still gives the title to a Roman prince. The house of Vivalanti was powerful in its day and the princes may often be met with not always to their credit in the history of the Papal States. They were oftener at war than at peace with the holy see and there is the story of one pope who spent four weary months watching the view from a very small window in Vivalanti's donjon. But in spite of their unholy quarrels they were at times devout enough and twice a cardinal's hat has been worn in the family. The house of late years has dwindled somewhat both in fortune and importance but nevertheless Vivalanti is a name which is still spoken with respect among the old nobles of Rome. The lower slopes of the hill on which the village stands are well wooded and green with stone pines and cypresses olive orchards and vineyards. Here the princes built their villas when the wars with the popes were safely at an end and they could risk coming down from their stronghold on the mountain. The old villa was built about a mile below the town and the gardens were laid out in terraces and parterres along the slope of the hill. It has long been in ruin but its foundations still stand and the plan of the gardens may easily be traced. You will see the entrance at the left of the road a massive stone gateway topped with moss covered urns and a double row of cone shaped cypresses bordering a once stately avenue now grown over with weeds.
