Abstract

Statistical comparisons by a t-test with a significance level of 5% (two-tailed). If the assumptions were violated by the data, a non-parametric test (Mann-Whitney U-test) was used. All statistical calculations and plotted graphs were performed using Statview (Abacus Concepts and Berkeley, CA). The authors (J.B. & J. B.) were also members of the French Society for Experimental Forest and for the French Association for the study of the growth and development of plants. The authors are grateful to the members of the French Society for the growth and development of plants, especially, for the organization of the 1998th International Symposium on the growth and development of plants, which was held in 1998 in Montpellier, France.

These results suggest that social skills in general, and interpersonal communication abilities in particular, are related to the likelihood that an individual will successfully be hired into an organization. Moreover, the results suggest that the general cognitive functioning and personality of the potential employee are important in the hiring process. In particular, it was suggested that the hiring manager would make hiring decisions based on perceived social behaviors and history of similar social effectiveness and related social adjustment. Thus, the results are consistent with organizational theory that emphasizes the importance of social behaviors.
