

Social Stratification of the Poor in America

Following the death of President John F. Kennedy in 1963, Lyndon B. Johnson became president. His first order of business as president was to launch an ambitious set of programs known as the Great Society. The main goals and purpose of these programs were to promote racial equality and to eliminate poverty throughout the United States. Though the Great Society plan was believed to be a solid plan that would bring social stratification to an ultimate conclusion, it is argued to have done just the opposite, while also causing conflict in the world order.

President Lyndon B. Johnson's aspiration of the Great Society was to design a plan to improve American life for everyone. As most Americans experienced exceptional prosperity, the idea of pockets of poverty in the United States became unacceptable to Johnson. President Johnson determined that his plan would make great changes including equality of opportunity, enhancement of urban life, improvement of education, ending poverty, and implementing racial justice.

The Economic Opportunity Act of 1964 created a wide variety of educational, training, loan and assistance programs for the needy. Among these programs, the Job Corps provided 100,000 young, unemployed men and women with training and job experience. Community action programs (CAP) aiming at solving urban poverty through grass-roots community efforts such as Head Start, sought to foster the healthy development of low-income families. Due to education being the key to Johnson's upward social mobility, he signed the Elementary and Secondary education Act of 1965. This was supposed to give better educational opportunities to the poor through federal subsidies.

In 1965, Medicaid for the poor, and Medicare for the elderly, was created to pay their healthcare costs. The 1968 Housing Act proposed to build 600,000 federally subsidized housing units over the following 10 years. Under the provisions of the act, the federal government gave poor people a lower mortgage rate when they bought a house and partially subsidized the operations of the estate developers willing to build or to renovate low-cost housing. Other programs targeted immigration, the arts, and the environment. The Immigration Act of 1965 abolished the quota system established in 1924. With the 1965 measure, immigrants were accepted on a first-come, first-served basis, regardless of their racial or national origins. The National Foundation of the Arts and Humanities Act of 1965 created the National Endowment for the Humanities. The Federal Water Quality Administration was formed in 1965, while the National Air Pollution Control Administration, created in 1955, gained some regulatory powers under Johnson's program.

Through the eyes of most, President Johnson's Great Society plan was making a significant difference to the "War on Poverty," but the President had his political critics. Johnson should have been riding high at the time, but he faced incr
