Abstract

The objective of the study was to evaluate the reproduction performance and estimate the genetic parameters, in a real environment, of the rabbit of the exotic Myplus breed. The study will allow appreciating the parameters that could be the object of genetic improvement in view of a selection to produce a more efficient rabbit. The work took place at the SAP Mè (Adzopé) farm from January 2013 to June 2013. One hundred and twenty breeding does were followed for five successive generations of five parities each, with an interval of 14 days between the parturition and the next mating with weaning at 30 days. These females produced 3283 total born rabbits with 3054 born alive and 4730 weaned. The genetic parameters including heritability, genetic, phenotypic and non-genetic correlations (environmental effects) did analyzed using the Derivation Free Restricted Maximum Likelihood program. The results obtained showed that the receptivity and fertility rates did significantly influenced by the order of parity and the season of breeding. The pre-weaning mortality rate was 8.27%. Females had the best prolificacy<sup>1</sup> between the second and fourth parity, with an average of 9.09, 10.09 and 9.79 kits respectively. The heritability values of young rabbits total born alive, born alive, weaned and old rabbits were 0.22; 0.20; 0.16 and 0.12 respectively. These results showed that selection is possible for these studied traits.
