

Social Concerns in the 1980s

continued study of social issues of work at the following table (this one was added approximately the 1980s)

1. Gender In 1980, 35% of all women were employed in the workforce, up from 25% in 1960. This increase was due to a number of factors, including the fact that women were now earning more money than men in many professions, and the fact that women were now more likely to have a college degree than men.	2. Education Education was the most important factor in determining a person's income in 1980. This was a significant change from 1960, when a person's income was determined more by their occupation than by their education.	3. Income The average income was still low in 1980, but it was beginning to rise. This was due to a number of factors, including the fact that the economy was growing and that there were more jobs available.

1. Gender Women's groups were active in the 1980s, fighting for equal pay and equal opportunities. This was a significant change from the 1960s, when women were more likely to be in the workforce than men.	2. Education Education was the most important factor in determining a person's income in 1980. This was a significant change from 1960, when a person's income was determined more by their occupation than by their education.	3. Income The average income was still low in 1980, but it was beginning to rise. This was due to a number of factors, including the fact that the economy was growing and that there were more jobs available.
