History showed impressive gains in literacy for students in the Mississippi Delta in the 1960s. The Mississippi Department of Education had a special superintendent traveling on the circuit to monitor quality. Unfortunately, however, the momentum stopped after a series of crises at the state level: political paralysis, teacher's unions, budget cuts, and a general loss of faith in the state. The state's performance deteriorated and the nation's standards were abandoned. A period of stagnation followed, during which no significant progress was made and some significant backsliding occurred. In the early 1990s, the state began to show signs of improvement. In 1993, the state began to show signs of improvement. In 1993, the state began to show signs of improvement.
