

Thesis Statements and Counter-Claims

A thesis statement is a claim that sets up your argument. Your thesis should situate your argument within a broader discussion, which will likely involve addressing possible objections, or counter-claims. Counter-claims will help you develop a well-rounded argument by showing you've considered many possible positions on your topic.

Strategies for generating a thesis statement

1. If something about the text or issue you are considering bothers or intrigues you, make note of it. Sometimes the issues which perplex us make the best grounds for arguments.
2. Do some general browsing to see the kinds of things people are talking about in relation to this text/issue. Look up a recent journal article (See the "Library Database Guide" and "Evaluating Sources" handouts). Check out the footnotes in a scholarly edition of your text. You might even glance at Wikipedia, just to get some sense of the debatable issues.
3. After you've come up with a topic and your own claim about it, verbalize your thesis to someone else. Ask your friend to challenge you on certain points, which will help you recognize which counter-claims you need to include.

A thesis statement must...

Require further defending.

It should not simply be a fact. To test this, ask yourself: "Could anyone argue against this?" This claim requires further defending:

"In Book IX of Milton's Paradise Lost, Satan disguises himself as a serpent and tricks Eve into eating the apple."

Though it can be supported by the text, no one would argue with this statement.

Pose a possible answer to a question, not be itself a question.

Although it might be a good idea to ask a pointed question in your introductory paragraph, your thesis statement should provide your own answer.

"Although Eve eats the apple first, is Milton's Eve characterized entirely unsympathetically?"

This question might set up a nice argument (that Milton deflects blame from Eve through Satan's rhetorical prowess), but it is not a thesis statement itself.

Be narrow enough to argue in the size of your paper.

Your claim should not be too broad.
