Therapist Effects On Attrition In Psychotherapy Outpatients Bestmasters:

Therapist Effects on Attrition in Psychotherapy Outpatients Dirk Zimmermann, 2014-12-23 Dirk Zimmermann illustrates that some therapists significantly differ concerning their average dropout rates. He points out that initial impairment is a strong predictor of early termination. Different dropout criteria as well as various explaining variables on patient and on therapist level were assessed. Premature treatment termination is a common phenomenon in psychotherapy with mean dropout rates of about 20%. Therapist effects account for 3% 4% of the variation in dropout. The Effects of Expectancy Training, Commitment, and Therapeutic Conditions Upon Attrition from Outpatient Psychotherapy Joseph Richard Venema, 1970 Attrition and Psychotherapy, 2019 Attrition in psychotherapy also known as dropout is a problem that affects clients who terminate their families therapists mental health systems and the overall community. Research on attrition is vast. However the majority of this research has been done post hoc relied on quantitative methods and looked primarily at client demographic variables as the predictors of attrition. This has resulted in inconsistent findings offers little to no useful information about attrition and appears to blame clients for failed therapy. There has been little research on attrition from the perspective of clients who terminate. This study was designed to answer the question why do clients choose to terminate therapy prematurely. Qualitative methods were used. Twelve participants engaged in in depth one on one interviews. The interviews were transcribed and analyzed using Constructivist Grounded Theory methodology. In session and out of session behaviors by therapists were found to be the key reasons participants chose to end therapy. Experiencing invalidation rejection of a person's experiences emotions thoughts and perceptions invalidation of identity rejections based on a person's sexual identity invalidation of culture rejections based on a person's culture problems not being solved and not feeling valued by the therapist were key factors in participants decisions to terminate therapy. Immediate and long term consequences of these experiences including questioning sanity feeling anger feeling like a burden increased pain and despair prolonging of suffering and experiencing the loss of an important opportunity are also addressed. Implications and recommendations for theory research education practice and social work are discussed. Effects of Race and Sex of Client and Therapist on the Duration of Outpatient Psychotherapy Marlin Shaw Griffith, 1975 Client Attrition During Psychotherapy as it Relates to the Value Structure of the Client and Therapist Robert Lance Shotland, 1969 Therapist Effects and Treatment Effects in Psychotherapy Dong Min Kim, 2002 The Effect of Therapist Experience on Psychotherapy Outcomes Scott Christopher Leon, 2002 The present study investigated the impact of a therapist's prior experience treating clients on outcomes for future clients with similar demographic and clinical characteristics. Prior research has consistently failed to demonstrate that therapists receiving more formal training and experience are more effective than therapists with less formal training and experience. However the literature has been criticized for its poor operationalization of training and experience. A review of the medical literature indicates that better operationalization of these variables might lead to effects previously not found.

and could lead to the development of optimal training conditions for psychotherapists. The samples for the current study were taken from a larger sample of 2 366 outpatients receiving psychotherapy from throughout the country. Pairs of patients were matched within therapists' caseloads for demographic and clinical similarities but varied according to when they entered treatment. Results indicated that the second patient in the matched pair achieved superior outcomes to the first patient in the matched pair only if the latter patient entered treatment shortly after the initial patient within 15 and 75 days. These results indicate that under certain conditions therapists may become more effective with experience. Future research should continue to improve prior methodologies to explore conditions necessary for therapists to learn from experience.

The Role of Client and Therapist Expectations in Psychotherapy Attrition Susan Foster Stone, 1985 Premature

Termination of Outpatient Psychotherapy Kristin N. Anderson, 2015. Premature termination is a pervasive barrier to effective implementation of outpatient psychotherapy that frequently results in decreased treatment gains for clients and lowered morale for therapists. Unfortunately, despite its high prevalence and cost, premature termination remains poorly understood. The current study addressed some gaps in the literature using a national online survey design that permitted investigation of a broader range of potential predictors, exploration of more specific reasons for premature termination, and examination of longer term treatment outcomes than has been possible in most previous research. Participants were 278 workers from Amazon.com's Mechanical Turk, an online labor market regularly used for social science research. Participants completed an online survey about their treatment history, their most recent outpatient therapy experience, and therapist termination status, reasons for terminating prematurely, if applicable, treatment satisfaction, therapeutic outcome, and demographics. Over half of the participants reported prematurely terminating their most recent episode of therapy. Results revealed that premature termination of previous therapy episodes, a weak therapeutic alliance, and primary or comorbid depression were the best predictors of premature termination. These predictors were highly accurate in distinguishing premature terminators from treatment completers. Results indicated that being a woman, identifying as non-heterosexual, seeking treatment from a hospital outpatient psychiatric clinic, and having a therapist low in perceived multicultural competence were also associated with increased risk of premature termination. However, these predictors of premature termination did not remain significant when controlling for other variables. The three most common reasons for premature termination were environmental obstacles, dissatisfaction with services, and lack of motivation for therapy. Finally, with respect to therapeutic outcomes, treatment completers reported greater problem improvement, greater satisfaction with therapy, and less current functional impairment than premature terminators. However, contrary to expectations, no differences in outcomes were found between early premature terminators (five or fewer sessions) and late premature terminators (at least six sessions). Clinical implications, limitations of the study, and recommendations for future research are also discussed.

Premature Termination in Psychotherapy Joshua K. Swift, Roger P. Greenberg, 2014. Premature termination is a significant yet often neglected problem in psychotherapy with significant consequences for clients and therapists alike According to some estimates as many as 20% of adult clients terminate psychotherapy prematurely Even experienced practitioners using the best evidence based techniques cannot successfully promote positive long term change in clients who do not complete the full course of treatment This book helps therapists and clinical researchers identify the common factors that lead to premature termination and it presents eight strategies to address these factors and reduce client dropout rates Such evidence based techniques will help therapists establish proper roles and behaviors work with client preferences educate clients on patterns of change and plan for appropriate termination within the first few sessions Additional strategies can be used throughout therapy to help strengthen and reinforce clients feelings of hope enhance their motivation to create change develop and maintain the therapeutic alliance and continually evaluate overall treatment progress Case examples demonstrate how these strategies can be employed in real life scenarios Publicity materials PsycINFO Database Record c

Mitchell W. Harris,2011 Patient focused research systems have been developed to monitor and inform therapists of patients treatment progress in psychotherapy as a method to enhance patient outcome The current study examined the effects of providing treatment progress information and problem solving tools to both patients and therapists during the course of psychotherapy Three hundred seventy patients at a hospital based outpatient psychotherapy clinic were randomly assigned to one of two treatment groups treatment as usual or an experimental condition based on the use of patient therapist feedback and clinical decision support tools Patients in the feedback condition were significantly more improved at termination than the patients in the treatment as usual condition These findings are consistent with past research on these approaches although the effect size was smaller in this study Treatment effects were not a consequence of different amounts of psychotherapy received by experimental and control clients Not all therapists were aided by the feedback intervention

Therapist Effects in Trajectories of Change Simon Benjamin Goldberg,2017 While a consensus has for the most part been reached regarding the effectiveness of psychotherapy in general decades of research comparing different forms of psychotherapy have largely failed to yield clear evidence of the superiority of one particular brand of psychotherapy over another In contrast a growing body of literature has supported the notion that more meaningful differences exist between therapists rather than between therapies The current dissertation sought to examine the robustness and generalizability of the differential effects of therapists i e therapist effects in a large naturalistic psychotherapy data set In addition this project aimed at determining particular ways in which outcomes differ for high and low performing clinicians Drawn from a college counseling center a full sample of 10 098 patients seen in a total of 80 748 sessions of individual psychotherapy by 158 therapists were used This sample was split into clinical n 5 828 and non clinical n 4 270 portions based on baseline scores on the Outcome Questionnaire 45 Lambert et al 2004 with the clinical portion being the focus of most analyses Patient level effect sizes were computed in standardized units using a novel longitudinal d derived from regression lines fit individually to each patient's data Multilevel models were used to account for nesting of patients within therapists Evidence was found in support of the robustness and generalizability of between therapist variation in these data The intraclass correlation coefficient ICC in the clinical sample differed significantly from zero ICC 0.086 p 0.023 and was essentially unchanged in magnitude controlling for seven therapist and caseload characteristics Therapists average outcome in the clinical sample was shown to correlate with the same therapists average outcome in the non clinical sample r 0.28 95% CI 0.13 0.43 p
