250 WORDS

When you start working for a small business, sometimes there's no telling where it can take you. What started as a summer internship in project management led me to completely change career paths and decide to set my sights on obtaining a job in microbiology. When I returned to school for the fall semester, I gradually began taking more biology and chemistry courses, until one day I realized that my schedule was so full of science courses I might as well change my major. Now that I am graduating, I know that choice has made a huge difference in my life, and has been the motivation for me to pursue a master's degree in microbiology to continue learning in this field.

During my internship, I was originally in charge of managing the details of a scientific project, including the budget and employee responsibilities. Coming from a limited science background, I had to teach myself many of the concepts, and slowly learned to read and integrate scientific literature. One day during a group meeting, I began proposing experiments and alternative hypotheses – and that's when the president of the company asked if I'd ever considered doing research myself. Over the course of that summer, I learned and performed a multitude of scientific techniques, designing my own experiments and analyzing the results. I hope to take the skills I learned during that experience and enhance them during my master's work. My goal is to become a scientist conducting cutting-edge research that could save lives, and obtaining a master's degree in microbiology is crucial to my goals.
