In 1966, General Motors decided that instead of putting in the standard 200 cubic inch, four-cylinder engine into the Tempest, they would experiment by putting in a much larger 326-cubic-inch, V-8 engine. They called it the Pontiac GTS. General Motors was not sure this muscle car with the oversized engine would sell, so executives only authorized production of 5,000 of them. But sell they did. Then, after the stagnation of the 1920s, the American economy got back on track when the U.S. returned to free-market principles after World War II. By the war's end, Europe was in shambles and American manufacturers were glad to provide the materials and the equipment Europe needed to rebuild. The American economy boomed. Furthermore, the G.I. returning from the war settled back into life in America. They started families, invested in homes and new-bought cars.

As America grew stronger and economically more powerful in the 1940s, a segment of the car-buying public demanded faster and more powerful cars. The automobile companies were happy to oblige. When it was first
