

World Development Report, 1980

[The World Bank brought out the World Development Report, 1980, recently. We are reproducing below chapters 6 and 7 dealing with implementation of human development programmes, and priorities and progress in regional perspectives, respectively.]

Implementing Human Development Programmes Some Practical Lessons

This chapter concentrates on four key questions that invariably affect the way human development programmes are organised, and how effective they are.

Political support. This has been critical to the considerable success of human development programmes in reaching the poor. Its absence also helps to explain some of the failures.

Finance. Money alone will not produce human development. But a shortage of funds is a common, often binding constraint. So methods that reduce unit costs or raise new revenues have a considerable role to play in expanding services.

Administration. For many programmes, administrative and institutional capacities may be even scarcer than finance. Yet project experience shows that their importance is frequently overlooked.

Demand. The way families and individuals respond to services is crucial to improving health, hygiene and nutrition; to whether children from poor families go to school or have to work instead; and to reducing fertility.

These four factors—like education, health, nutrition and fertility—are closely inter-linked. For instance, financial and administrative constraints can be eased by political support, which in turn will be stronger if programmes can be made less costly or administered more readily, or if there is a heavy demand for them. The links, though, are not all complementary: for example, paramedical workers have lower salaries than doctors, but they need more supervision.

HUMAN DEVELOPMENT NEEDS POLITICAL SUPPORT

Political support for human development cannot be taken for granted. The poor frequently are politically weak. They are often too sick, uneducated, geographically dispersed and busy to be politically active. Influential elites, particularly large landowners, may oppose human development programmes if they feel that their power and status might be undermined. They might feel, for example, that educated children are less likely to settle for working in serf-like conditions on haciendas or plantations.

Even if there is no direct opposition, the extent and form of human development programmes will generally be influenced by keen political competition for limited tax revenues. Because policy makers generally live in urban areas, as do the most politically active of the people who benefit from public services, these programmes tend to suffer from urban bias (though reductions in urban social expenditures do not necessarily lead to increases in rural expenditures). But the health and education facilities available even to urban elites

World Development Report 1980:

World Development Report 1980, 1980 Abstract Developing countries start the decade facing two major challenges to continue the social and economic progress of the past 30 years in an international climate that looks less helpful and to tackle the plight of the 800 million people living in absolute poverty who have benefitted too little from past progress This report examines some of the difficulties and prospects in both areas One of its central themes is the importance of people in development The first part of the report addresses the expected sluggish world economic growth as oil importing countries reduce their current account deficits and adapt to higher energy costs Domestic policies of developing countries will be crucial and the fate of poor people in these countries will be decided largely by domestic opportunities and policies The second part of the report describes the role of human development programs in education health nutrition and fertility reduction and their related effects on productivity and population growth

External Relations Dept., 1980-09-01 This paper highlights that despite severe limitations of resources developing countries have made substantial progress during the past three decades in sending more children to school and in generally improving their education systems Enrollment of children in schools at all levels has expanded at unprecedented rates There has been a significant decline in the proportion of adults who are illiterate from 44 percent in 1950 to 32 percent in 1975 Public expenditures for education have increased steadily in developing countries to reach roughly the same share of national product as in industrialized countries Vietnam

,2024-09-09 In the late 1980s most of the world still associated Vietnam with resistance and war hardship refugees and a mismanaged planned economy During the 1990s by contrast major countries began to see Vietnam as both a potential partner and a strategically significant actor particularly in the competition between the United States and an emerging China and international investors began to see Vietnam as a land of opportunity Handbook of Regional and Urban

Santosh Mehrotra,Enrique Delamonica,2013-07-04 This book focuses on the provision of basic social services in particular access to education health and water supplies as the central building blocks of any human development strategy The authors concentrate on how these basic social services can be financed and delivered more effectively to achieve the internationally agreed Millennium Development Goals Their analysis which departs from the dominant macro economic paradigm deploys the results of broad ranging research they led at UNICEF and UNDP investigating the record on basic social services of some 30 developing countries In seeking to learn from these new data they develop an analytical argument around two potential synergies at the macro level between poverty reduction human development and economic growth and at the micro level between interventions to provide basic social services Policymakers they argue can integrate macro economic and social policy Fiscal monetary and other macro economic policies can be compatible with social sector requirements They make the case that policymakers have more flexibility than is usually presented by orthodox writers and international financial institutions and that if policymakers engaged in alternative macro economic and growth oriented policies this could lead to the expansion of human capabilities and the fulfillment of human rights This book explores some of these policy options The book also argues that more than just additional aid is needed Specific strategic shifts in the areas of aid policy decentralized governance health and education policy and the private public mix in service provision are a prerequisite to achieve the goals of human development The combination of governance reforms and fiscal and macro economic policies outlined in this book can eliminate human poverty in the span of a generation Development Anthropology Hari Mohan Mathur,2019-05-13 In opportunity framework of action to reduce poverty in the first decades of the twenty first century It views poverty as a multidimensional phenomenon arising out of complex interactions between assets markets and institutions This Report shows how the experience of poverty reduction in the last fifteen years has been remarkably diverse and how this experience has provided useful lessons as well as warnings against simplistic universal policies and interventions It shows how current global trends present extraordinary opportunities for poverty reduction but also cause extraordinary risks including growing inequality marginalization and social explosions The World Development Report 2000 2001 explores the challenge of managing these risks in order to make the most of the opportunities for poverty reduction The World Bank in a Changing World Ibrahim F.I.
