These authors also found that the more the child is involved in the decision-making process, the more the child is likely to be motivated to follow through with the decision. This is a key finding for parents and educators alike, as it suggests that involving children in decisions can lead to better outcomes. The authors also found that children who were involved in the decision-making process were more likely to be satisfied with the outcome. This is another important finding, as it suggests that involving children in decisions can lead to better satisfaction with the outcome. Finally, the authors found that children who were involved in the decision-making process were more likely to be responsible for the outcome. This is a key finding for parents and educators alike, as it suggests that involving children in decisions can lead to better responsibility for the outcome.
