

performance of insulation under realistic conditions. Research conducted by these organizations determined that R-values are, in fact, dynamic, based on the temperatures with which they interact.

Depending on the insulation type (whether mineral fiber or foam plastic), three or four major variables can affect the R-value performance of the insulation. Conduction and convection exhibit a linear relationship between temperature and R-value, whereas radiation impacts R-value to the fourth power. Additionally, blowing agents used in certain foam plastic insulations typically are unaccounted for, but can have an adverse effect on R-value. These blowing agents have both a condensation point and a boiling point, meaning they have the potential to change from one phase to another phase based on ambient temperatures. If the temperature is low enough, condensation occurs in the blowing agent, and the increased thermal conductivity of the liquid in the cell significantly reduces the R-value. "Figures 1, 2 and 3" (see this page, right and below) illustrate heat transfer mechanisms, as well as the effects of condensation in the cells. Moisture present within insulation also can drastically reduce that insulation's efficiency.

Theory Versus Real World

Although lab tests can help determine the individual characteristics of a product, these characteristics can change drastically when installed or tested as
