Since they are genetically identical, why aren't identical twins completely identical? Why can they be even less identical as they age? This video explores some recent advances in the new field of epigenetics – how our genes interact with our environment, and how some changes due to those interactions can affect later generations.

1. Before the Human Genome Project read the sequence of the entire human genome, scientists thought we had around 100,000 genes? About how many do we really have?
2. What kind of chromosomal change causes both Angelman Syndrome and Prader-Willi Syndrome?
3. What controls whether a child has Angelman Syndrome or Prader-Willi Syndrome if they have the associated chromosomal abnormality?
4. What is imprinting?
5. All our cells have the same genes, so why aren't all our cells identical?
6. Why would scientists interested in epigenetics want to study identical twins?
7. When Szyf and Meany injected rats with a drug that removes epigenetic marks, how did the rat's ability to handle stress change?
8. What was the hypothesis regarding why the children of Holocaust survivors also suffered the same traumatic effects as their parents even though they did not experience the Holocaust first hand?
