1. INTRODUCTION

The Near Earth Asteroids are potential impact threats to Earth, but also a particularly accessible subset of them does provide potentially attractive targets for resources to support space industrialization. Robust technical and economic approaches to evaluation of the feasibility of proposed projects are necessary for assessment of such space mining ventures. This paper discusses the technical engineering and mission-planning choices and shows how the concept of probabilistic Net Present Value can be used to optimize these choices, and hence select between alternative asteroid mining mission designs.

The generic mission reviewed envisages a lightweight remote (teleoperated) or semiautonomous miner, recovering products such as water or nickel-iron metal, from highly-accessible NEAs, and returning it to Low Earth Orbit (LEO), for sale and use in LEO, using solar power and some of the recovered mass as propellant.

Some of the technologies needed to avert comet or asteroid impact are similar to those needed to recover the diverse resources contained in these bodies. Thus it is desirable to develop this technology, and asteroidal resources, both to achieve space industrialization, species security, and long term prosperity, and to build the capacity to avert disaster.

This paper reviews concepts for mining the Near-Earth Asteroids for supply of resources to future in-space industrial activities. It identifies Expectation Net Present Value as the appropriate measure for determining the technical and economic feasibility of a hypothetical asteroid mining venture, just as it is the appropriate measure for the feasibility of a proposed terrestrial mining venture. In turn, ENPV can obviously be used as a "design driver" to sieve the alternative options, in selection of target, mission profile, mining and processing methods, propulsion for return trajectory, and earth-capture mechanism.

2. POPULATION OF TARGET BODIES

Recent progress in asteroid search programs (especially LINEAR, www.ll.mit.edu/LINEAR/) has been spectacular. According to Dr David Morrison, in the latest issue of his NEO Newsletter (dmorrison@arc.nasa.gov), there are now about 1400 identified NEOs, defined as objects whose orbits have a perihelion less than or equal to 1.3 AU. Of these, about 300 are classified as PHAs (Potentially Hazardous Asteroids), meaning that their orbits come within 0.05 AU (7.5 million km) of the Earth's. Of the total 1400 known NEOs, some 500 are of absolute visual magnitude less than 18, and therefore nominally of diameter larger than 1 kilometre. This recently derived number is larger than had previously been considered likely.

Estimates based on the serendipitous rediscovery rate indicate that the total population of ">1 km bodies" within the NEAs is now at least 1000, and the total population of ">100 metre bodies" is now
