5 pages | 1244 words

When I first started this course a few weeks ago I had no idea what Macroeconomics was about, and I had no interest in learning the subject. When I first started reading the first chapter in the book, I thought to myself "Boy this was going to be a long semester". However, as I read through each chapter and started to complete the assignments in Mind Tap along with responding to the questions and reading the responses on the discussion board, I found that I was starting to gain a more of an interest and a greater knowledge of the Ten Principles of Economics found in Chapter One. I didn't realize that economics is something that can be applied to our daily lives. Economics is a social science concerned with the production, distribution, and consumption of goods and services. Economics can be viewed as a social science because it uses scientific method to build theories that can explain the behavior of individuals, groups and or organizations. After taking this macroeconomics course, it became quite evident that everyone is affected in some way by macroeconomic issues such as inflation and unemployment. I can easily relate to one of these issues. I was working part-time for Papa Gino's when they decided to file bankruptcy, everyone that worked for that location was laid off abruptly including myself. Sometimes in life we are faced with unexpected problematic issues, but life goes on, so we just must pick up the pieces and keep going. Throughout this paper I will be applying economics to my everyday life through personal experiences and or situations. I will discuss things like opportunity cost, how people respond to incentives and more. To get things started I would like to start off by demonstrating how real-world economics can be applied by using two different types of statements. Positive statements which are statements that can be verified and known to be factual. An example of this would be "Government-provided healthcare increases public expenditures. On the other hand, there is normative statement, which are subjective statements that carry judgement on the way something should be. This is very much relatable in the real-world, I can think of many times when I have made normative statements. For instance, I was talking to my neighbor about healthcare insurance and because his employer didn't provide healthcare insurance, he would have to pay out of pocket for his medication that cost him over two hundred dollars a month, he was having a hard time affording his medication that he needed to take daily. Healthcare should be provided for everyone, especially those whom cannot afford it on their own. No person should go without much needed treatment or medication. It should be either provided by the government or should at least more affordable for people who otherwise cannot afford it. Throughout this semester there were several articles and discussions in Economics. I believe that I was very fortunate to have taken this course because it has taught me a lot about things that may be essential to everyday life. Thinking back on some of these issues we face...
