Introduction

Light is a part of a continuous spectrum, or energy waves. Shorter wavelengths of energy have greater amounts of energy. For example, high energy ultraviolet rays, with wavelengths of approximately 1 nanometer (nm) to 400 nm, can burn living tissues that no other light sources can. Shorter energy, wavelengths of light include the visible part of the light spectrum (400 nm to 700 nm) and the infrared (IR) part of the spectrum (700 nm to 1,000,000 nm). Long visible light, with the longest wavelength, has enough energy to cause chemical changes without destroying biological molecules. The short, high frequency waves of gamma rays (100 nm) have the most energy and break the hydrogen bonds that hold together biological molecules such as amino acid and nucleic acids (DNA). The longer waves of radio, microwaves and infrared waves (100 nm to 1,000,000 nm) do not provide enough energy and are absorbed by other water molecules in a plant.

When light is absorbed by leaf pigments such as chlorophyll a or b, absorbed visible light (photosynthetically active radiation or photosynthetically active energy) is used to produce ATP, the molecule ADP to ATP and a chemical compound called carbon dioxide (CO_2) into sugar molecules, a process called carbon fixation that takes place, normally, where the rate increases and decreases with a reaction that controls opening and closing of the leaf stomata and the rate of photosynthesis. The leaf stomata regulate movement of water molecules and carbon dioxide (CO_2) into the leaf, enabling the photosynthesis reaction to occur at the correct rate for photosynthesis. As photosynthesis proceeds, oxygen is released and the water and carbon dioxide change into sugar and oxygen that move to other parts of the plant. When a plant stomata is closed, the rate of photosynthesis is low. Stomata that are open, allowing the highest rate of photosynthesis, are called stomata. The rate of photosynthesis is affected by the amount of light, the amount of CO_2 and the temperature. The rate of photosynthesis can be measured by the amount of oxygen released. The rate of photosynthesis can be measured by the amount of oxygen released. The rate of photosynthesis can be measured by the amount of oxygen released.
