

parties. All trades occur through registered market participants, including brokerage firms, trading houses, and asset management companies.

- II. Listing Fee Revenue: Companies that are in need of capital can raise money by listing their securities on the NYSE, after meeting eligibility criteria. They need to pay a one-time listing fee and then a recurring annual fee for listing and trading services on the NYSE platform. If a company wants to be listed on the exchange (thus allowing traders to buy and sell its stock through the NYSE), it must pay yearly fees of up to $250,000.
- III. Data Fee Revenue: Market participants need historical data for research and analysis, real-time data for ongoing trading and investment activities, summary data for reporting and auditing, and reference data for security-specific details like symbols and corporate actions. Provision of such data from NYSE involves payment of a specific charge.
- IV. Trading Software and Technology Revenue: The NYSE offers its various technology services and trading software to large institutional clients like mutual funds and asset management companies. This also includes co-location, where the computers of a large trading firm are placed and managed by the NYSE on NYSE premises, offering dedicated services with close proximity to the marketplace for faster trade execution and access.
- V. Registration and Regulatory Fee Revenue: NYSE market participants, market makers, and brokers need to register and pay the registration and regulatory fee for their NYSE membership. The NYSE also charges for facilitating trading licenses. All such charges include the one-time registration fee and recurring annual charges.
