Activities for Nonfiction Text

Headings & Subheadings

A heading, found at the top of a page, section, or chapter of a nonfiction text, gives the reader information about the topic of the text that follows. Sometimes, the text is divided into smaller sections. These sections may have their own headings, or subheadings. Like headings, subheadings help organize the information on a page and give the reader clues about what to expect in the text ahead.

Making Predictions with Headings

Headings are titles at the top of a page, section, or chapter of a nonfiction text. Headings help to organize the text on the page. They also give the reader information about the topic of the text that follows. You can use a heading to make a prediction about the text before you read.

Using Subheadings to Locate Information

Subheadings help organize a nonfiction text. They give the reader clues about what to expect in each section on the page. You can use subheadings to predict where you'll find specific information.

Look only at the heading and subheadings in the article, "Alpine Skiing," before you read the rest of the article. Read the questions below. Predict which section will have the answer to each question. Then read the article and complete the chart to show where you located that

Question:	I think I will find the answer in:
1. When did alpine skiing become a popular sport?
2. What is the purpose of ski poles?
