"Investing in monitoring technology is the most effective way to protect people from tsunamis."

To what extent is the statement true? Give evidence to support your answer. (2020)

Tsunami monitoring systems predict tsunamis and are usually linked directly to warning systems. The warning systems can then be activated when a tsunami is predicted, thus giving people more time to evacuate from coastal areas. In earthquake-prone Hawaii, in the USA, for example, a complex network of seismographs, pressure sensors and deep-ocean detectors have been installed to predict, forecast and monitor tsunamis. Many of these devices and systems are situated in other parts of the world, especially near plate boundaries. The lead time between the initial prediction of when the tsunamis will hit allows citizens to evacuate to safer areas. This directly reduces the death toll, and hence the impact of the tsunami.

However, both the tsunami monitoring and warning systems do not come without limitations. Deep ocean detectors, for instance, tend to give false alarms when waves are high and strong. Since 1948, it was estimated that 3 out of 4 predicted tsunamis were false alarms. The time required for governments and scientists to ascertain and confirm that tsunamis reduces the lead time that could be used for evacuation. This is because evacuation can be costly because not only the logistics required to move and temporarily house people, the economy along the coastal area has to come to a standstill means a loss in the revenue too. In addition, residents along coastal areas may also grow accustomed to the false warnings and become complacent about the warning systems. For these reasons, the monitoring and warning systems may not necessarily help in reducing the impacts from tsunamis.

Furthermore, the effectiveness of tsunami monitoring and warning systems depend on other factors. For one, if the tsunamis happen at night, the evacuation will be less efficient because most people would be asleep and hence caught unprepared. Another possible reason that limits the effectiveness of the monitoring and warning systems is the level of preparedness of governments and the people, especially when it is a high magnitude tsunami. Japan, for instance, is usually prepared for earthquakes and tsunamis. Nevertheless, the 2011 tsunami in Japan was of such a high magnitude that it caught the Japanese by surprise, thus resulting in extensive damage. These factors, therefore, also affect the impacts of the tsunami, even if proper monitoring and warning systems are in place.

Other than investing in technology, another preparedness measure is that of emergency drills. People take part in emergency drills by moving to safe locations, listening to instructions given by trained personnel and practicing first aid. They may also become members of local response teams that assist people during a disaster. Japan conducts emergency drills on 1 September to commemorate Disaster Prevention Day. This prepares the people mentally on how to react to a disaster. Main roads are blocked and emergency vehicles have to seek alternative routes to reach affected areas. As emergency drills are designed based on the most serious earthquake ever recorded in the area in the past, the emergency drills and evacuation plans might not prepare them adequately for higher magnitude earthquake. This happened in the earthquake in
